The Inclusion of Other in Self scale

Circles 1-7 above reflect how a person's sense of who they are can be connected to their partner.

For example, some couples have a strong sense of being their own individuals while others share a joint identity. More individualistic couples may be more likely to introduce themselves and not mention their partner while couples with shared identities often introduce themselves in a way that involves their partner. The circles above try to illustrate how partners' sense of identity can range from being two individuals in a relationship to having an overlapping identity as almost one entity.

With you as 'Self' and your partner as 'Other', please examine each of the circles above and select the image number which best describes how you see your identity in relation to your partner: *
